My experience of a “blessing in disguise” was when my smartphone broke down a year ago. Around that time, I was crazy about a mobile game, and spent so much time on it that my grades were terrible. When the phone blacked out, I was panicked because it meant that I couldn’t log in to the game for more than a week, and my world rank would descent. I didn’t know what to do in my free time without my phone. During the repair, however, I realized how badly I was addicted to the game, and how much time I’d wasted on the mere data. The event I regarded as a nightmare at first taught me the importance of spending my time on more life-enriching experiences such as studying, playing sports, and talking with my friends. (136 words)
